

S. W. D. in Lincoln Journal.
This trying to be clever,
Enough to fool the hicks,
Makes me wish I'd never
Got into politics.

One morning last week, having nothing in particular to do, and not averse to swapping a few with the boys, I started out on a pedal tour with a view of whooping up my candidacy for whatever I am running for. At the first house I approached, the door was opened by a red-headed lady of Ethiopian dimensions. "Good morning," says I, pleasantly, giving a little gentle impetus with my toe to a mangy-looking hound, who seemed bent on having a little taste of "candidate for a change." "Is the boss at home?" "Yes," says she, in accents sweet as virginia, "what do you want with me?" "None," I began, suddenly remembering that she can wield the ballot, as well as the rolling-pin. "The fact is," says I, "I have an ambition to represent you in the General Assembly before the legislature is corrupted, the senate disrupted and the State is bankrupted," and handing her a copy of my platform, I asked her to read it. Finally, she says, looking at me kind of strange, "I believe you are noncompensated." "No," I says, "I ain't, my folks are all Methodists, and my grand-parents were all Methodist, but if I ever get religion, I think I'll split the difference and join the noncompensated." "Get out of here," she yells, "I'll vote for you, but it will be to put you in a straight-jacket and padded cell," and with that she slams the door in my face. As I sauntered off, I made a mental resolution that I would not solicit any more support from the weaker (?) sex, that it wasn't worth the trouble and risk. The next person I met was a scabby looking son-of-a-gun, riding a flopped over cousin of Balaam's steed. "Good morning," says I, introducing myself, "I'm glad to meet you." "Yep," says he, "that's what another fellow said once—and he bent me out of a hundred dollars in a horse trade." Well, I am not a horse-thief says I, "though some people say that a candidate is just as about as low in the social scale, but that as it may, I am a candidate, and would appreciate your vote and influence." Well, I don't know," says he, "I might vote for you if nobody else don't run, but as for influence, I ain't had a drop in a month's age. I think Sheriff Harrison has got the boys so scared they ain't making any more." I saw nothing was to be gained by arguing with him, I bade him adieu and ambled on.

At the next place I stopped, I was met by a grizzled old cuss with a bay window and a No. 10 foot. "What do you want?" he growled. I rattled off my little spiel to him, and concluded by saying that I would be glad to have his support. All right, here's one of 'em now," he snaps, aiming his No. 10 at the part of my trousers that's used the most, but I was like the Irishman's den, I wasn't there. I took a flying leap down the steps and made record time getting home, my political ambition cooing out at every pore.

But don't get it in your head that I'm showing the white feather, for I am in the fight to the finish. If some of the conceited, pot-bellied-worry-headed yahoos that Lincoln county has been sending to the Legislature, have been tolerated, I know that I'll be received with a great ovation. And, my opponent can absorb this at his leisure; if he does defeat me in this race, he'll never look fit for anything afterwards.
